SHAWN BATES' experience includes helping prosecute a complex mining case for an Australian company, a case he began only six months after graduating from Georgetown law school. "Achieving a victory for such an honest, hard-working company was more rewarding than I can put into words." He adds, "I strive to make sure everything I do is both ethical and effective for my clients."

AT YETTER & WARDEN,
 WE ONLY DO ONE THING:
 PREPARE AND TRY COMPLEX
 BUSINESS AND TECHNOLOGY
 CASES TO ACHIEVE OUTSTANDING RESULTS.

ERIC CHENOWETH is skilled in handling commercial and intellectual property disputes, including patent litigation. He has handled litigation involving defective hospital constructions and for a Canadian firm in a nuclear plant business park dispute, among other cases, relying on his engineering background and Virginia law degree. As he describes his approach, "I am guided entirely by the desire to achieve the best possible outcomes for my clients."

GEORGE FIBBE, a Harvard law graduate, began representing some of the nation's top airlines in successfully preventing software firms from unauthorized "screenscraping" of the airlines' websites, only weeks after finishing a federal clerkship. He explains his enthusiasm for cyber-law: "I particularly enjoy complex technology issues and adapting traditional legal principles to the Internet. Tackling these cases is both challenging and gratifying."

KIMBERLY McMULLAN has used her Harvard law degree and expertise in securities law to conclude a major corporate investigation by a California software company into insider trading and breaches of fiduciary duty by its former directors. In evaluating new cases, she says, "I start with what I bring from my past experiences, and then apply cutting-edge legal approaches. I enjoy the challenge of resolving intractable business disputes."
